

I am originally from Indonesia and hold a Master's qualification in Urban Design of Healthy Cities, having studied in China and Spain. Early in my journey, I participated in a volunteer architectural project at University of Nations (UofN) Cambodia that supported community initiatives.

That experience helped me realize that life is not only about building cities, but about building opportunities for others.

It shaped my interest in social and environmental issues, particularly how poverty, health, and urban conditions are interconnected. I believe everyone deserves the opportunity to live in a healthy and supportive environment. I am currently volunteering with HOPE Inc. (Australia), supporting research and strategic work that promotes responsible and sustainable environmental stewardship.
